AI + Human Exploration of Daily Moral Decisions

Topic Pair Exploration

We analysed 100,000 threads—the largest such study to date—using algorithms to identify topic clusters. Human participants helped to refine the algorithm by deciding when to combine similar clusters and how to assign thematic designations to threads.

AITA for going to the parents of the girl my stepsister has been bullying?

The situation at hand: My stepsister (17f) has been bullying this girl in our grade, Mia. Mia is a very shy person. We were never friends but were friendly until the bullying started and then Mia withdrew from everyone. I found out about the bullying over a month ago. People described it as "not real bullying" but my stepsister has called her names and told her she doesn't deserve friends. I found a note telling Mia this. I was pissed. My stepsister and I never had a good relationship (always fighting) but I never figured she was an actual bully, just someone who got on my freaking nerves. I ended up going to Mia's parents with what I knew and the evidence of the bullying and now it has been brought up with the school and Mia's parents want my stepsister expelled. My dad is pissed. He said it was so unbelievably petty and mean spirited to go to the girls parents over "sibling issues". I told my dad nothing between us would ever be sibling issues, because we're not siblings and my siblings (younger brother and sister) would never do that to another person. My stepsister has been suspended right now but it looks like she'll be expelled Thursday when the big meeting happens. My dad's wife is freaking out and so are my stepbrothers. With the exception of my siblings everyone seems to think I'm wrong for doing what I did, for not at least talking to my stepsister first. I feel like going to Mia's parents was the right call because of how serious bullying can be for the person being bullied and even calling someone names can cut a person really deep. But I never expected this kind of reaction. Life at home is very awkward right now.

NTA, if he's lying about this, what else is he lying about? I'm a disabled combat veteran and stolen valor pisses me off.

i should've told Kathy this privately
This is what you should have done.

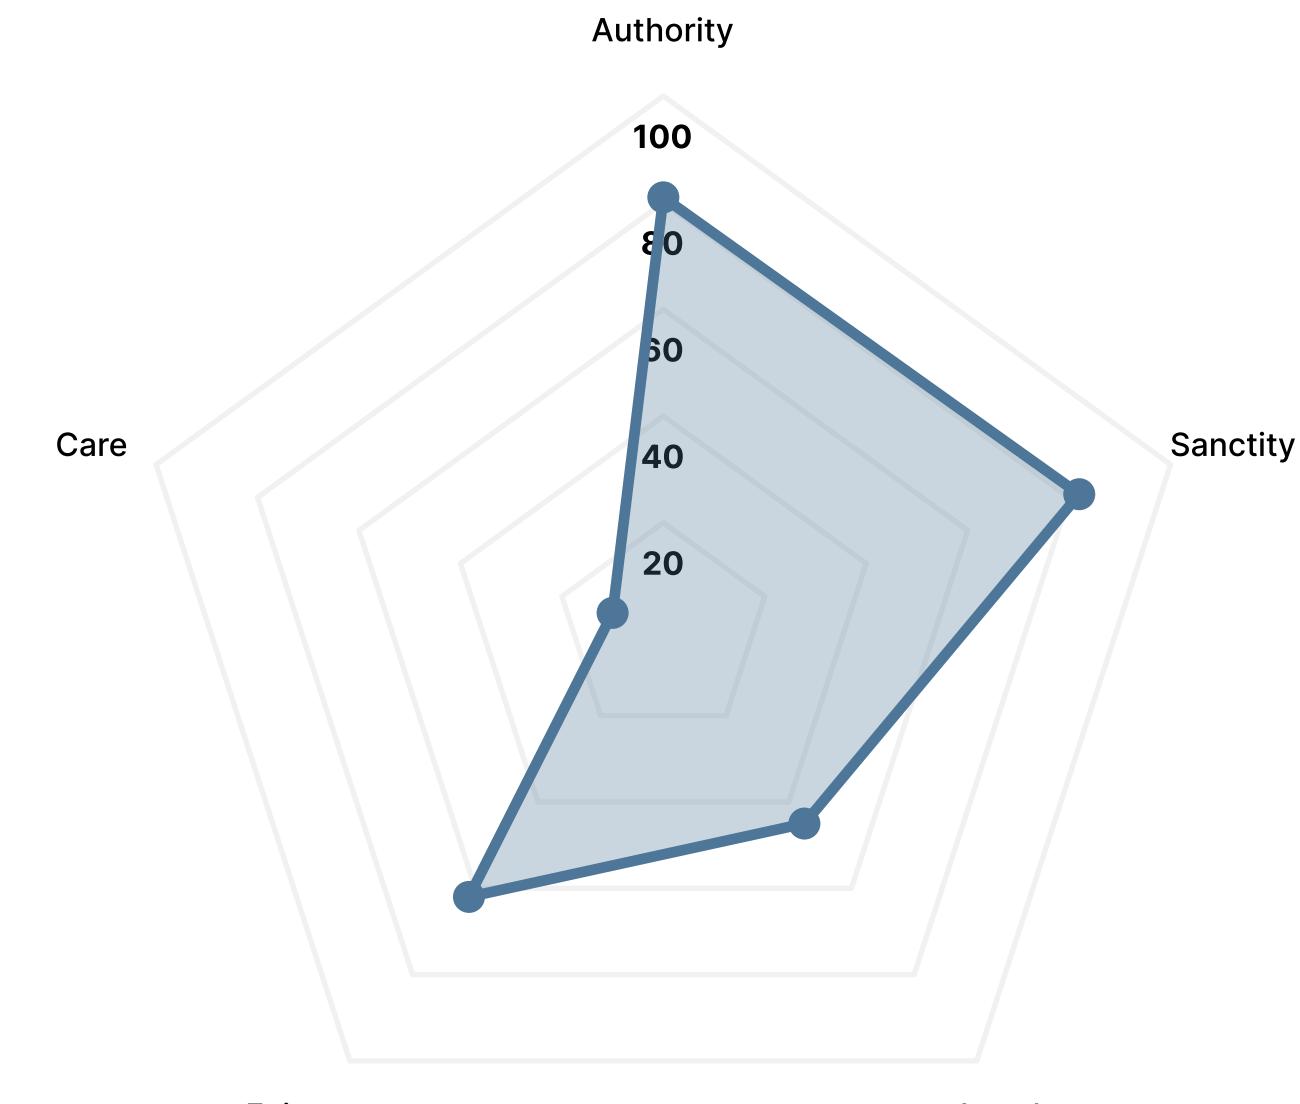

NAH
Nah I don't think that's it. I do think he was way more led by his own anger than concern for Kathy though AITA for exposing a man as a fake veteran before his wedding?

I'm from New Zealand and i live in Ireland at the moment. One of my friends, Kathy, is Irish and had been dating another kiwi named John. John claimed to be a member of the New Zealand Royal navy. I knew he was a phony from the beginning, since i am a member myself i noticed him wearing the uniform incorrectly on social media and when i met him at a party he told me stuff that didn't make sense such as serving in units that would've been impossible with his occupation and time he claimed to have enlisted etc. I have told Kathy and her friends my concerns but they never believed me because he had photos of him with groups of other navy guys on ships. Im guessing either photoshop or maybe he had a bunch of other phonies dress up on a ship or something idk.
